terminale,Â .Thermodynamic Evaluation of Cassava Starch as an Alternative to Corn Starch for Bread Production and Impact on Starch Digestion Metabolites. The objective of this study was to determine if the modification of starch properties can alter the functionality and biochemical properties of cassava starch. Incorporating cassava starch into bread along with corn starch increased the water absorption, dough volume, and the ability to resist the extension when stored at room temperature. When the bread was roasted, its chemical and physical properties significantly affected the retrogradation of starch. The addition of cassava starch reduced the retrogradation of starch in bread samples, especially after roasting, when compared with unmodified corn starch. In addition, starch gelatinization temperatures and enthalpies were reduced, and β -amylase susceptibility increased, showing that cassava starch may be a suitable replacement for corn starch in bakery products. Pressure-sensitive labels typically comprise a flexible polymer substrate material having a pressure-sensitive adhesive coating on the side opposite the substrate. Such labels are used for a variety of purposes, such as securing sheet material such as packaging material to a substrate surface. Particularly as they are used to secure the ends of tape, or other lengths of adhesive-backed labels, to a substrate surface, these labels are provided with a perforation or other line of weakness to permit separation of the labels from the tape or other substrate. One such type of such a label is a pressure-sensitive label known in the art as a "tear strip". These tear strips are extremely useful for indicating the end of a package or other elongated object which is being formed, and usually require continuous application of the label material to the package as it is being formed. In this use of the label material, it is necessary that the perforation line be readily detectable
