It is designed to be concise, easy to use, and more inclusive of non-industrial technology, while also being able to support research and development (R&D) and innovation activities. The patent classification in SPC is primarily concerned with the technological domain of the invention, which allows it to effectively describe the scope of invention. The classification is used to enhance understanding and management of patents in a variety of fields including the biotechnology, electronics and information technology. The SPC classification system was developed by working groups of the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) in 1989, 1990, 1993, 1994, 1997, 1998, 2000, 2003 and 2006. The first version of SPC was published in 1995. It was
