Trance Leads Expansion.rar >> Trance Leads Expansion.rar Maybe you didn't know that there is a huge difference between an arpeggiator and a sequencer. It's all about the "on-off" concepts of the individual functions, which in turn has a great influence on the workflow and the resulting sounds. Now, let me show you an example. Here is what the VST set-up of the arpeggiator looks like on the left and the classic sequencer with MIDI channel input on the right: In this picture I only showed the Arp edit mode, but of course we also have the full-fledged arpeggiator in the sequencer mode. And the sequencer has the ability to choose from different input channels and the arpeggiator can be set to single or to parallel mode. So, please make sure that you are using an arpeggiator in the sequencer mode and not vice versa. How to make presets? The best way to get the best out of your sequencer is to save the pattern play-ins as arpeggiator presets by pressing the "save" button. You can also set the arpeggiator to automatic play mode with "pattern play-ins". By that you can play a song on your sequencer, enter your pattern and let it play in the arpeggiator. If you are using REFx 2.1 or higher, you have the option to save the pattern play-ins as arpeggiator presets automatically. When you start the arpeggiator, you get a dialog window where you can save the play-in as a preset for the arpeggiator. The arpeggiator will call this preset when you set it to automatic mode. Nexus2 ARP You may ask yourself what the difference between Nexus and ARP is. Basically, you have presets for the whole arpeggiator and then you have a standard arpeggiator, whose individual functions you can set up separately. So, with Nexus you have presets for the whole arpeggiator, with ARP you have presets only for the arpeggiator. However, the only difference in the arpeggiator is the way how the patterns are assigned. All the arpeggiator settings can be adjusted with the arpeggiator settings dialog. So in Nexus you have the setting for "Pattern 6d1f23a050
